

Telemental Health sessions should mirror those of in-person sessions; both locations (clinician and client) are treatment rooms and should provide the same professional specifications as those of a standard in-person clinical service room. Clinicians should make every attempt to adhere to the following expectations:

- Privacy: The clinician should make every effort to ensure privacy so that the clinical discussion cannot be heard outside of the rooms where the services are being provided. If there are other people present, either in or in or near the service room), both will be made aware of these individuals and agree to their presence.
- Noise Level: Both the clinicians and clients rooms should be free of noises that could distract from the clinical sessions. This includes but is not limited to door bells, televisions, radios, children, animals, and other conversations.
- Physical Environment: The physical environment of the room (i.e. seating, lighting, and ambiance) should allow for the maximum comfort of the clinician and client. To maximize clarity and visibility, the provider and client's cameras should be placed at the same elevation as the eyes.
- Visual Distractions: The clinician's background should be free of visual clutter. KEPRO recommends a neutral colored wall to minimize distractions.
- Clothing: Clinicians are expected to dress professionally for their telemental health sessions. Clothing that could be distracting from the clients sessions should not be worn.
- Eye Contact: Maintaining good eye contact during telemental health sessions is imperative. Clinicians should avoid doing other work, looking at other computer screens or engaging in any activity that prevents them from maintaining good eye contact with the client.
